

Education: Parent-Teacher Meetings with Sara and Peter

Parent-Teacher nights were always interesting for Sara and Peter. With three kids, they often found themselves running from one teacher to the next.

Luckily, they didn't have to worry too much about their children, all of them were well-behaved and did well in school. That didn't mean that it wasn't helpful for them to come to meet the teachers, it gave them a good idea of who their kids were spending so much time with, as well as let them get ahead of any potential problems.

That's part of how they had discovered their son's issues with math so early.

Now he had an after-school tutor to help him grasp the concepts he struggled with. Some of the things they did were centered around his homework, but Sara had noticed the improvements of his marks in his tests and exams.

Sara waved hello to the principal, Ms. Jones. Ms. Jones was new to the school, and Sara wasn't sure what to think of her yet, it was still too early to tell. She had implemented a no detention during recess rule, Sara had heard that this meant some children were arriving home later.

Sara and Peter had been going to parent teacher nights since their kids were in Preschool, now, with their eldest in High School, it all felt slightly routine.

They received the report card, they congratulated the kids, one week later they showed up in the gym to discuss the report cards with the teachers.

As she waved to one of the English teachers, Sara was suddenly glad to think about the strong community she was building around her kids.
